Inspired by the story of Joel Salatin, creator of Polyface farms, this game is about Joel's inability to pay off a gambling debt. This means that Joel is left to live out his days on a houseboat, with nowhere to go, and only one way to make money. Your goal is to keep Joel as poor as possible, as long as possible. You do this by sorting corn into different bins, each bin having its own profit value. You can't control your environment, but you can choose your initial investment. Each day, Joel wakes up and you decide how the fish you sorted the day before are split. Get inspired and see what Joel eats for breakfast. Get inspired and see how exactly he lives. War, Cold War, and the Birth of the Modern Assassin Collects Shadow #7-11 (Sept. 1993-Oct. 1994), covering a four-issue storyline from "Cold War." Featuring covers by Joe Quesada, Mick Gray, and Jeff Albrecht, this is written by Jim Shooter, with art by Clint Bowers and J. Bone. James Booth's first shot as Shadow is disarmingly sweet. "For months, I had been considering moving back to Los Angeles,"[1] he begins. With the Cold War wrapping up, all his attention had been focused on what was happening in the U.S. Also, because L.A. was his home, he liked having a steady job. Finally, Booth received orders to move back to L.A. and find a temporary hideout. On his first few days back, he tagged along with his younger sister. Years ago he had spent months there, while they were sorting out some acrimonious parental conflicts that had spilled over in his life. At one point, he decided that returning to become Thomas Green, L.A. police detective, was the best way to resolve some of the family issues. Back then, it was successful. But now, he's putting his career on hold just to continue his plans to live in California. Checkmate, and Thunderbird "On the first day on the road,"[2] Booth is struck by Thunderbird.[3] After all that's gone on, Booth almost can't believe he's got a bullet-proof car. However, his sister, Kate, would love to have a car like this. To say the least, it's reminiscent of the one shown in the opening. That day, the pair have a number of experiences at Native American sites and museums. I don't know how much this happens. But it seems as though Booth may be shown the significance of such sites. A lot of what he sees seems to affect his thoughts about a life of revenge for revenge's sake. Neither of them comments on this. However, this could be because they're just shut up in the car. Then, Booth approaches a museum that shows, among other things, these Native American artifacts. With several booths kept behind glass doors, he sees that, among other things, a display that's labeled, "BONKADO'S GHOST!!!!" To him, this name spells out how inept and vile the owner
