Page 4. â€” Install Arabic Language Pack for Windows.It is known in the art of computer graphics and game display to render images that are three dimensional using a sampling and encoding scheme that reduces the number of three dimensional samples required for the desired graphical output. See, for example, the book entitled Three Dimensional Computer Graphics, pp. 21-49 and 105-153, Second Edition (1991), by Clark Taylor and Richard K. Beyer, which is incorporated herein by reference for all purposes. These systems of “texture mapping” have been very successful in providing increased realism to two dimensional graphical images. However, the performance of such known techniques is severely limited by the number of texture samples required to fully represent the object in the image. In particular, with respect to computer graphics rendering, large number of objects, such as, for example, a city, often contain many thousands of fixed objects such as stationary buildings, billboards, signs, statues, manhole covers, etc. These objects tend to repeat in many different locations in the city or other such scene. This repetitive and redundant graphic content is not efficiently handled by conventional 3D texture mapping, which requires sampling each of the objects in the scene independently and as if they are stationary. It is desirable to reduce the need for sampling of the redundant content while still maintaining the necessary textures to represent the dynamic features of moving objects. Additionally, it is desirable to reduce the number of textures required to represent a scene without loss in visual quality. A variety of techniques have been developed to address the problem of texture data redundancy. For example, in U.S.
