The final approach requires measurement of all the likely outcomes, and measuring impact in the user experience of each outcome. As a start to the process, having a budget does not guarantee the success of the project and may not include a marketing plan. If a business has a marketing and R&D budget it is best to focus this on product development, rather than marketing activities. The needs of the customers and end-users are very different: they must be assessed individually. This is the only way to determine what kind of outcome is required to ensure best business performance, not least that the business can continue its existence and evolve in a successful way. In the end-user market the main focus should be on cost reduction: the two times the customer pays less than the technology enables the business is the external opportunity.
