The research done at Virginia Military Institute (VMI) by Terry Love, a laboratory technician in the Cell Sorting Lab, has been the subject of a virtual tour by the World Science Fund, a U.S. foundation devoted to international partnerships of academics and industry. The tour involves the World Science Festival, a weekend-long series of lectures, film screenings and workshops designed to encourage both the public and scientific community to address emerging challenges to the world as we know it. Through his projects, says Love, a senior, "we're able to show how cell sorting is able to enhance the quality of biological data." The school grounds are vast, and most of the buildings are new. But the old part of VMI, dating from 1861, is a particularly lovely place. It's a campus of about 40 buildings with enough open space to accommodate a campus of a couple of hundred buildings. Over its long history, the campus has been home to scientific research, and lots of it. Love is part of a culture of sifting through things that are already known and discovering something new. It's a bit like a toy magnifying glass that reveals an image of the universe. "You might Alzheimer's disease (AD) is the most common neurodegenerative disorder. Various therapeutic strategies have been developed to treat AD and among them, the modulation of the acetyl cholinesterase (AChE) and BACE1 is considered the primary approach. However, several side effects such as off-target effects and the enormous efforts of development makes the development of novel drugs practically, time consuming and expensive. Recently, we have shown that sirtuin3 (SIRT3), a NAD-dependent protein deacetylase, which is also known as the anti-aging protein, improves the cognition of mice infected with Listeria monocytogenes (LM) and attenuates the LM-induced neuroinflammation. Based on these findings, we hypothesized that SIRT3 overexpression may improve the cognitive impairment in AD animal models, and further, we examined its neuroprotective properties in the Tg2576 mouse model of AD. The results of behavioral assessments have shown that SIRT3 overexpression in Tg2576 mice improves their memory impairment. Moreover, the overexpression of SIRT3 decreases A $\beta$  oligomerization, and decreases the phosphorylation of tau and  $\beta$ -site amyloid precursor protein-cleaving enzyme 1 (BACE1) levels and ameliorates pathological changes in the Tg2576 mouse model of AD.[Histopathological study of acne vulgaris].
