new international report warns that the world is on track to become the first generation with more than 10 billion people on the planet. The UN's latest population estimate predicts that the world's population will have grown from about 6.9 billion in 2014 to as many as 8.7 billion by 2050. And with 1.4 billion people expected to live in Africa by 2050, the UN's projections look set to put the continent under unprecedented pressure with a distinct threat of migration from the rest of the world. "The population momentum is now an undeniable reality," said Sylvie Goulay, senior author of the report, "Reducing fertility without sacrificing lives: pathways towards more sustainable growth." "Population momentum," she said, "is the rate at which populations are growing over time." The UN's global-health arm estimates that all forms of deaths and fertility are increasing at a rate of 1.8 per cent per year, and it is that rate that will ultimately determine how many children many couples decide to have. The report found that fertility in Niger was still comparatively high, with its population expected to have grown by 59 per cent to 190 million between 2014 and 2050 – a level that will result in the country becoming one of the fastest-growing in the world by 2050. But in contrast to Niger and other poorer countries, the report warns that rich economies, which tend to have large populations, are also starting to experience the side effects of too many people living too close together. The report found that fertility rates in Denmark had dropped by 14 per cent between the 1990s and today, while France had experienced a drop of 13 per cent. "If you want to look at growth, then the single main
